

life force, inevitable rat race and choices to live

we are running a lot, to look at the rat race, to preparing to join the rat race which is already a rat race, then joining a closed rat race and then finally pushed to the international network of a gigantic rat race. with no feelings or emotions, walking like a dead self like a robot which dispenses useful information and resources when asked and just to behave as is when asked.

my jee path was difficult, once you bow your head to it, there is no coming back, once you determined that you are going to this path, its over, there are only two possible outcomes - you finish the preparatory rat race i.e. get into a premier institution or else you die fighting - rarely physical but surely internally and brutally. there is no guarantee you will be safe within yourself either. weaklings die imagine horribly slipping on the race to the point that it breaks your skull and bones and give you an unhealable trauma to the point that there is no hope in recovery and coming back to sanity. i never had sanity tbh. i ran i ran i ran to the point that my only objective was to move forward no matter what. but a small turn, a small slip, made me fall down to the ground horribly with mental fractures god knows how much time it will take to heal apparently.

and the worst part is, i wanted to get out of it, i wanted to start new, meet new people, turns out i was still bleeding, i wanted to feel safe once again, on the path itself, i made you feel unsafe. imagine getting your life force sucked to the point that continuing life feels useless and you complain that you are an anti-social element, which can only cause harm.

well, if continuing life like this running on reserve energy is the solution, id rather prefer a short ending tbh. idk how well i can continue.

the final burst

precontext

What is meant for you can never be taken away by anyone. Until then, develop the ability to wait patiently.

you say no one will stay always, but who is staying now

The person who is meant for u will stay, Not others

im back to vantha vaa varati po mindset

No need to say those lines..No one is going to care abt it. Everyone has their own problem

The way you say things makes people not to care abt it. Everything has a limit.

You keep hurting me and the people around me.

ill come back when i am better then, i dont want to shed my blood here. i just wanted to talk.

You always erase the part you played in hurting others and only tell the story of what the world did to you, pretending that you were the only one who suffered.

I told u the reason why i have started ignoring u and i don't see it as inappropriate. Likewise everyone has a story for why did they leave you.

Every single one around me has a story rn

Who knows, maybe everyone has a justice on their side.

Thats why i started isolating, as a whole, no one cares and no one will care

Everyone wants to care for the person who deserves it. No one will Intentionally remove a person from their life unless they wanted to.

no one tries to come near a wounded person unless they have a weapon on their own

Sometimes, a wounded person is wounded because of their own actions. Not every wound is caused by the world; sometimes, we create our own wounds through our actions.

True

"and the worst part is, i wanted to get out of it, i wanted to start new, meet new people, turns out i was still bleeding, i wanted to feel safe once again, on the path itself, i made you feel unsafe. imagine getting your life force sucked to the point that continuing life feels useless and you complain that you are an anti-social element, which can only cause harm."

The more u write about it ,the more u suffer.If u think this as the best way to ease ur pain na...It's definetely not gonna work.

better than bottling up inside

Atp ,everyone wanna to take this move that is 'Don't Care'

maybe i am unsociable

final answer

I understand that you have gone through a lot, and I'm not saying that your pain, trauma, loneliness, or struggles are fake. I genuinely believe that you have suffered in many ways. But at the same time, your suffering doesn't automatically make everyone else the villain in your story. You keep talking about how the world abandoned you and how people hurt you, but you also need to look at the things you have done and the ways your own actions have affected other people. Sometimes, the consequences you are facing are not because the whole world is cruel or because everyone betrayed you. Sometimes, we also have to take responsibility for the choices we made. I'm not saying you deserved the pain you experienced. Nobody deserves to be bullied or emotionally broken. But your past cannot be used to justify hurting people in the present or blaming everyone around you for the consequences of your own actions. You say you're afraid of becoming "MONSTER" but being a good person is not just about feeling guilty or suffering silently. It is also about recognizing when you hurt someone, taking responsibility without making excuses, apologizing sincerely, and actually changing your behavior. I'm not against you, and I'm not trying to invalidate your struggles. But please don't make me, or the entire world, look like the reason for everything you are going through. I have my own feelings and experiences too, and your pain doesn't erase the impact of what you have done to me. Healing starts when you stop seeing yourself only as a victim and start honestly looking at yourself as a person who has been hurt, but who is also responsible for their actions. Both things can be true at the same time.